JAMAICAN PASTORAL

Island Records founder and hotelier Chris Blackwell shares his love for Jamaica through his latest homegrown hit—his farm.

BY REBECCA WALLWORK
PHOTOGRAPHY BY JESSE CHEJAK

EASY AND QUARTER CENTURY AGO, when Chris Blackwell bought Pan trepan, a 2,500-acre cattle farm in Jamaica's Cockpit Country, 20 miles inland from Montego Bay, his entrepreneurial dreams lay elsewhere. In 1989, the record producer had sold his wildly influential Island Records to Polygram for $300 million and was establishing a new hotel venture in Miami. Pan trepan would serve as a home and private retreat, a place where he could unwind with friends such as Ron, Gwen, Jerry and Bob Marley's family. He loved its towering guano tree, the majesty of the white Brahman cattle, the fruit trees filled with birds. What he didn't know was that more than two decades later the farm would, like a rug, become another vehicle for showcasing Jamaica to the world.

This summer, Pan trepan will launch regular farm-to-table dinners for guests of Blackwell's three luxury resorts: Goldeneye, situated on the country's northeast coast, as well as its sister Island Outpost properties—Strawberry Hill near Kingston and The Coves in Negril. Guests will have the opportunity to visit the farm and... well has streghtened his identity, he does, he does,
He also celebrated the 1st cocoa ming in re steps that had irked his nothing accent

THE LATEST BLACKWELL project began brewing in Jamaica nearly a decade ago. By 2006, he had sold his Miami portfoilio of hotels (they’d been losing money) and narrowed his focus to Jamaica and the Bahamas. Each property had a cool celebrity mystique—regular guests included Kate Moss and Keith Richards—but their island locales and regal soundscapes made them more approachable than stuffy. Blackwell insisted that the staff be front and center, encouraging them to forge connections with guests. Again, he hit on a winning formula by listening to the rhythms of Jamaican culture. “I’ve always looked for a location that is fantastic and then said, ‘Okay, how can we make it comfortable?’” Blackwell says. “I want people to enjoy the simplicity in the natural.”

In late 2006, Blackwell expanded Goldeneye, adding new beach- and jungle-front villas and amping up the marketing—with his personal touch still evident. The villa interiors have a simple, clean aesthetic and pops of vivid batik prints from the Royal Hat line created by his late wife, Mary Vivian, a Parsons-trained fashion and home furnishings designer, who died in 2009. Grace Jones introduced them in the early ’90s. The Logitech Squarespace music system is loaded with an eclectic playlist curated by a DJ friend who lives in Tel Aviv. Red stripes in the retro Smeg refrigerators are sold at a friendly $30 apiece. The villas have claw-foot tubs, outdoor showers and feature air-conditioning, despite Blackwell’s misgivings—he despises the way AC “cuts the sound of the sea, the crickets and the tree frogs. All those sounds which are so important to the sensory feel of Jamaica.”

Boozes at Goldeneye average $1,000 a night, but the vibe is warm and laid-back, encapsulating the lang duum; rhythm of Jamaican life. “It’s where I recharge my batteries,” says fashion entrepreneur Emanuelle Della Valle, who has been going to Goldeneye since meeting Blackwell through Miami’s Campbell in the mid-’90s. He finds inspiration in its simple, casual days that contrast with the frenetic pace of New York. On previous trips to Jamaica, Della Valle had stayed in places where guests were hostages of these huge hotels—you never get to know anything about the Jamaican culture.”

The idea of sharing his farm idyll—making it a more sustainable enterprise—grew slowly for Blackwell. (The only things Blackwell appears to do fast are waving, driving and his pet pastime: jet-skiing.) While the resorts had always relied on local providers for most of their produce, only importing what they couldn’t source from Jamaica, Blackwell knew he had an impressive resource with his farm.

Starting in 2006, Pantrapez made small periodic deliveries of lettuce, broccoli, cauliflower, cabbage, oranges and beets to Goldeneye. There was no official pipeline in place, but Blackwell was already contemplating how to scale operations in order to serve all his resorts.

The allure of Pantrapez’s rolling pastures, its river, natural water hole and roaming wildlife is amplified by its isolation—it lies at the end of a boat-up, paddle-road in the sleepy green parish of Trelawny. “It’s like setting back the clock 300 years,” says Della Valle.

The word organic finds its way into almost any description of Blackwell’s style. From a farming perspective, it was always the rule. The first thing Blackwell did when he bought Pantrapez was to eradicate the use of chemicals; he hated the smell and opted for a more costly, labor-intensive, natural method of farming. “What replaces the chemicals is people loving to cut bush all the time,” he says. “But I like to create a few more jobs.”

Echoing his path in the music industry, his knack for spotting talent would ultimately help him achieve his goals. His personal chef, Talcie Neil, worked for Blackwell and his mother for 30 years. Goldeneye’s executive chef, Nantas Clarke, grew up near the resort and always dreamt of working for Blackwell. One of Blackwell’s two sons, Chris, who is 12, now works on Blackwell Rum, another recent initiative that launched in the U.S. last year and is based on an old family recipe. (Blackwell’s other son, Charlie, is 13.)

Gardener Ramsay Dacosta has worked at Goldeneye since the days of “Commander” Fleming. Today, at 76, he still works part time, tending to fast acre warning, driving and his pet pastime: jet-skiing.) While the resorts had always relied on local

LOCAL HEROES Clockwise from opposite page: Lion. Pantrapez’s resident Rastafarian, was living on the farm when Blackwell bought it; a bamboo shed in a field planted with fruit trees; Anna, I. Pantrapez’s cook; picks callaloo from the garden, before serving it for breakfast with fresh eggs, toast and butter churned from the farm’s dairy cows.

“THERE’S ALWAYS LOOKED FOR A LOCATION THAT’S FANTASTIC AND SAYS, OKAY, HOW CAN WE MAKE IT COMFORTABLE? I WANT PEOPLE TO ENJOY THE SIMPLICITY IN THE NATURAL.”

—CHRIS BLACKWELL
pick their own callaloo and milk a cow. Blackwell has never liked the limelight and always kept Pentapart private, so the news came as a surprise. At Goldenside, he explains the move is in "the best interest of the business," which means he does so slowly and organic outcomes of his passions. He also reveals an incongruent motive: "I'm interested in marketing Jamaica," he says. "Jamaica has the best coffee, the best sugar, the best ginger and some of the best coconuts in the world."

Blackwell has come straight from swimming in Goldenside's salt-green lagoon, located mere steps from his front door. He's dressed in a T-shirt and shorts, sporting espadrilles and bracelets around his wrists. Tall and statuesque, at 78, he looks like something of an aging hippie—one with a quiet English accent and a thirst for innovation.

Agricultural tourism was never on the agenda when he was growing up between Jamaica and London—teaching water skiing in Montego Bay, selling air conditioners and studying accounting at Price Waterhouse. But neither was earning a berth in the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, an accolade the Island Records founder accepted in 2001. Born in London, Blackwell spent his early years on a large estate in Jamaica where his mother had grown up. He started his label in Jamaica in 1959 before returning to London, where he was educated, to sell records in the city's West End community. In the '70s, Blackwell signed seminal reggae artists like Lee "Scratch" Perry, Burning Spear and Toots & Maytals. Bob Marley's subsequent stint was a coup for Jamaica—not just Jamaican music—and cemented Island's legacy. There were also albums from the B-52s, Tom Waits, Robert Palmer and U2.

Blackwell's ease in the recording studio was a natural sampling off point for his daring into hospitality. Two of his first properties—The Marlin Rod, in South Beach, and Compass Point, in the Bahamas—included recording studios, making them natural hubs for rock stars and models. He had purchased Goldenside—the former home of author Ian Fleming, who was a close confidante of Blackwell's mother, Biaucia Lindo—in 1976, but the accommodations at the time were modest. Fleming wrote his iconic James Bond novels in a macabre room with the shutters closed to the gloomish view of his private beach. The sound of the sea, the crickets.

By the mid-'90s, Blackwell owned a clutch of Art Deco boutique hotels in Miami and another on Harbour Island in the Bahamas, intimate places with bright colors, quirky designs and an atmosphere where celebrities felt at ease. Rather than rub shoulders with the talent at industry functions, Blackwell created spaces for his artists and friends to visit him. "The people love it," says Barbara Campbell, founder of London's legendary fashion store Biba, and the designer responsible for Goldenside's new interiors. "Beyond, the Spirit Girls, Mick Jagger, you'd tell them things that you knew about anything, how it all works, and you were invited back to his place."}

Blackwell calls this period "a magical time," although his film company, Palm Pictures—another of his 90s businesses—did fare well. "I think we've both come unstuck on occasion because we've followed our passions," says fellow Englishman and record label founder Richard Branson. "But I don't think either of us are really interested in business, per se. We love creating things." Over the years, Blackwell added cottages to Goldenside, inviting friends to visit. By the late '80s, he had opened it as a resort, but never widely promoted it. Again, he'd created a playground for the jet set—this time flying the Jamaican flag. "Miami was all rock 'n roll," says Halulintik. "Whereas, you could tell that Goldenside was such a personal thing for Chris. No doubt in part due to the relationship between his mother and Fleming—the pair were close friends, part of a circle that also included Noel Coward and Errol Flynn. Blackwell had even worked as a location scout on the 1962 film adaptation of Fleming's Dr. No.

HE LATEST BLACKWELL project began brewing in Jamaica nearly a decade ago. By 2004, he had sold his Miami portfo- lio of hotels (they'd been losing money) and narrowed his focus to Jamaica and the Bahamas. Each property had a cool, seductive mystique—regular guests included Kate Moss and Keith Richards—but their island locals and reggae soundtracks made them more approachable than publicly. Blackwell insisted that the staff be front and center, encouraging them to forge connections with guests. Again, he hit on a winning formula by listing to the roots of Jamaican culture. "I've always looked for a location that is fantastic and then said, 'Okay, how can we make it comfortable?'" Blackwell says. "I want people to enjoy the simplicity in the natural." In late 2010, Blackwell expanded Goldenside, adding new beach- and lagoon-front villas and shaping up the marketing—with his personal touch still evident. The villa interiors have a simple, clean aesthetic and pops of vivid basic colors from the Royal Blue line created by his late wife, Mary Vinson, a Parsons-trained fashion and home furnishings designer, who died in 2009. Grace Jones introduced them in the early '80s. The Logitech Squamosas music system is loaded with an eclectic playlist curated by DJ friends who live in Tel Aviv. Red stripes in the retro Smeg refrigerators are sold at a friendly $3 price. The villas have close-foot tracks, outdoor showers and feature air-conditioning, despite Blackwell's misgivings—he despises the way AC cuts out "the sound of the sea, the crickets and the tree frogs. All those sounds which are so important to the sensory feel of Jamaica." Rooms at Goldenside average $1,000 a night, but the vibe is warm and laid-back, encapsulating the laid-back rhythm of Jamaican life. "It's where I recharge my batteries," says fashion entrepreneur Emanuela Dalicea, who has been going to Goldenside store meeting Blackwell through Naomi Campbell in the mid-'90s. He finds inspiration in its simple, casual days that contrast with the frantic pace of New York. On previous trips to Jamaica, Dalicea had stayed in place where guests are hosted of these hotels—you never get to know anything about the Jamaican culture." The idea of sharing his farm isy—making it a more sustainable enterprise—grew slowly for Blackwell. (The only thing Blackwell appears to do fast are walking, driving and his pet pastime: jet- skiing.) While the resorts had always relied on local providers for most of their produce, only importing what they couldn't source from Jamaica, Blackwell knew he had an impressive resource with his farm. Starting in 2008, Pentapart made small periodic deliveries of lettuce, broccoli, cauliflower, cabbage, oranges and lux choy to Goldenside. There was no official pipeline in place, but Blackwell was already contemplating how to scale operations in order to service all his resorts.

The allure of Pentapart's rolling pastures, its river, natural water hole and roaming wildlife is amplified by its isolation—it lies at the end of a beat-up, potholed road in the sleepy green parish of Trelawny. "It's like setting back the clock 200 years," says Dalicea. The word organic finds its way into almost any description of Blackwell's style. From a farming perspective, it was always the rule. The first thing Blackwell did when he bought Pentapart was to eradicate the use of chemicals; he hated the smell and opted for a more costly, labor-intensive, natural method of farming. "What replaces the chemicals is people having to cut bush all the time," he says. "But I like to create a few more jobs."

Echoing his path in the music industry, his knack for unearthing talent would ultimately help him achieve his goals. His personal chef, Taucie Neil, worked for Blackwell and his mother for 30 years. Goldenside's executive chef, Nerissa Clarke, grew up near the resort and always dream of working for Blackwell. One of his two sons, Chris Blackwell, Jr. (his other son, Chance, is in LD, now works on Blackwell's Rum, another recent initiative that launched in the U.S last year and is based on an old family recipe. Blackwell's grandfather pur- chased Jamaica's leading rum company, J Wray & Nephew, in 1917.)

Gardener Ramsey Darccia has worked at Goldenside since the days of "Commander" Fleming. Today, at 70, he still works part time, tending to Blackwell's garden, carving coconuts for kids and planting fruit trees selected by guests. The grounds are dotted with plaques bearing bold-faced names who have taken part in the planting program. Their donations of $1,000 each go to Blackwell’s Oracabessa Foundation, named for a nearby town (home to many Goldeneye workers) to benefit local sustainable development projects.

The kine that positioned Pan trent as sustainable occurred in 2001, when Gustavo Diaz came aboard as the farm’s general manager. As a graduate of Costa Rica’s Earth University, Diaz arrived with a wealth of knowledge about organic farming—and a five-year vision for what Pan trent could become.

“I’m thrilled to have Gustavo because I know nothing about farming,” says Blackwell, who had heard of Earth University through a friend in Washington, D.C., and now provides funds for two Jamaican students to attend the school each year. “I know what I like—the produce and having lots of fruit trees that the birds like—but I never wanted to look like a farm farm with rows of plants. I want everything about the”

The research, expertise and analytics come from Diaz, who talks at length about a slew of initiatives: the growth of weekly deliveries to island outposts resorts, now offering more than 30 different in-season fruits and vegetables; recycling the hotel’s plastics and glass—a concept so foreign in Jamaica that the broken-down pieces must be shipped offshore for processing; and collecting food scraps to feed to a colony of Black soldier flies, which in turn produce larvae that are sun-dried and fed to chickens or livestock. “The whole idea is to close the loop,” says Diaz. “Devour the nutrients back into the system.” He’s been collecting vegetable oil to eventually use as fuel for the farm’s diesel engine, and is planting trees to serve as “live fences” for the 700 acres of pastures.

To-date, Pantreent has diverted 10,000 pounds of recyclable materials from landfills; it has composted more than a thousand pounds of waste. The introduction of solar power has reduced the farm’s energy bills by 40 percent. Next up is the chicken project. “After seeing the movie Food, Inc., we realized what we are doing,” Diaz says. “A full integration of the farm and everything we do is hospitality is simply one of our core objectives.”

“It never ends,” adds Blackwell.

Given all of his efforts to promote Jamaica and its natural assets, I wonder why he hasn’t gotten into politics or worked for the tourism board—like his cousin John Pringle, the founder of famous Jamaican resort Round Hill, did in the 90’s. “I’m not suited for either of those things,” he says. “That requires thinking of what works best for the majority, and I like to walk my own path.”

He would, however, be more than open to other avenues. Round Hill recently started their own farm-to-table dinner series, showcasing local purveyors, and the resort has its own vegetable and herb garden. A former Pantreent farmer, Adam Miller, and his wife, Marya Kessler, have established their own CSA—Community Supported Agriculture—at nearby Potosi Farms. Other small-scale projects are peppered across the island.

“I would love to see a couple hundred places in Jamaica doing it,” says Blackwell. “I think Jamaica would thrive if we promote agriculture as a way to bring people here.” It would, he says, encourage guests to venture out of hotels and into local restaurants and food stalls. “I think it would help to foster the entrepreneurial spirit, which is so strong in Jamaica, and give them a piece of the tourism business. That’s the most important thing that should happen here.”
DOWN ON THE FARM  Check out from above:
Large plot with various crops, including cabbage, parsley, sweetcorn, and more—in an area known as Chris’s garden, a table laid for lunch beneath the giant sorcery tree.

resort has its own vegetable and herb garden. A former Pateqasset farmer, Adam Miller, and his wife, Martha Kosler, have established their own CSA—Community Supported Agriculture—at nearby Potosi Farms. Other small-scale projects are peppered across the island.

"I would love to see a couple hundred places in Jamaica doing it," says Blackwell. "I think Jamaica would thrive if we promote agriculture as a way to bring people here." It would, he says, encourage guests to venture out of hotels and into local restaurants and food stalls. "I think it would help to foster the entrepreneurial spirit, which is so big in Jamaica, and give them a piece of the tourism business. That’s the most important thing that should happen here."